1. Rarely is there enough time in our hectic, bill-by-the-hour days and run-by-the-minute nights to sit back and reflect on where we are and how we got there. Court calendars have now slowed down. Deals are intermittently interrupted as people take vacations or drive kids to college.
2. The dog days of summer are a great time to step back and assess. Keeping it simple, it's a good time to adopt just one professional goal to reach until next year's dog days. A new marketing plan? Growing your practice area?
3. It is less cliché to create a professional resolution during bee season than during the holiday season; you may also find your own genuine buzz.
